

ISSN Print: 2394-7500
ISSN Online: 2394-5869
Impact Factor: 8.4
IJAR 2020; 6(10): 787-789
www.allresearchjournal.com
Received: 06-08-2020
Accepted: 09-09-2020

Rabindra Kumar Sahu
Research Scholar, PG
Department of English, LN
Mithila University,
Darbhanga, Bihar, India

Postmodernism in the shadow lines: A study

Rabindra Kumar Sahu

Abstract

Indian writing in English has inscribed its greatness by mixing up tradition and modernity in the production of art. The interest in literature is the burning thirst of the writers which turned their energy and technique to innovate new forms and styles of writing. Earlier novels projected India's heritage, tradition, cultural past and moral values. But a remarkable change can be noticed in the novels published after the First World War which is called modernism.

Amitav Ghosh is one among the postmodernists. He is immensely influenced by the political and cultural milieu of post-independence India. Being a social anthropologist and having the opportunity of visiting alien lands, he comments on the present scenario the world is passing through in his novels. As per postmodernists, national boundaries are a hindrance to human communication. They believe that nationalism causes wars. So, post-modernist speaks in favour of globalization. Amitav Ghosh's novels centre on multiracial and multi-ethnic issues; as a wandering cosmopolitan he roves around and weaves them with his narrative beauty. In The Shadow Lines Amitav Ghosh makes the East and West meet on a pedestal of friendship, especially through the character like Tridip, May, Nice Prince etc. He stresses more on the globalization rather than nationalization. This paper attempts to expose the postmodern elements in The Shadow Lines.

Keywords: Communication, nationalism modernism, border, generation, culture aesthetics, post modernisms, politics, international

Introduction

The finest contemporary Indian-English writer remains incomplete without the name of Amitav Ghosh. Amitav Ghosh has undoubtedly earned his position in the canon of India English fiction. A noted novelist, an essayist and a non-fiction writer, Amitav Ghosh's standing in the realms of literature is truly unparalleled. Ghosh's second novel The Shadow Lines is more sombre less fanciful in its politics, and quite stunning in the power with its formal experience in sequence and location resonate thematically

The Shadow Lines traces nearly a half-century of interlocking relation among three generations of two families, one Indian and one British, giving perhaps the definitive fictional demonstration of Benedict Anderson's diction that nations are "imagined communities"; it is the story of the family and friends of the nameless narrators which has its roots in broader national and international experience. In the novel the past, present and future combine and melt together erasing any kind of line of demarcation. The text deals with the concerns of our period, the search for identity, the need for independence, the different relationship with colonial culture. The Shadow Lines interweaves fact, fiction and reminiscence.

Discussion

In his novel Amitav Ghosh explores the ideas of nationhood and diaspora, ideas that involve relationship between individual as belonging to the same or to different communities that sometimes transgress and transcend the shadow lines of political borders. The Shadow Lines probably represents Ghosh's most direct confrontation with nationalism and national identity and it is simultaneously about each character's personal identity. Both in political science and geography there is a specific definition of a country or a state. However the word 'country' bears a specific meaning to a man. A man's entire entity of present, past as well as future is associated with his own country or native land, homeland. In general, the part of land where one is born becomes one's homeland, native land or motherland. Within the parliamentary system it is a rule that a country will keep up the rights of people of that

Corresponding Author:
Rabindra Kumar Sahu
Research Scholar, PG
Department of English, LN
Mithila University,
Darbhanga, Bihar, India

Country but when the state is unable to bear the responsibility of a man, his whole entity is at stake. On the background of that crisis Amitav Ghosh writes an invaluable novel The Shadow Lines.

Amitav Ghosh's The Shadow Lines is a narrative of events which are related to each other. Most of the narrative in the physical world is set in Calcutta, Delhi and London, and often times, uses as background, various historical events that define the Indian subcontinent like the Swadeshi Movement, the partition of India and the communal riots of 1963-64 in Calcutta and Dhaka and also to some extent the Second World War. The novel at its very outset has a multicultural and multi-spatial appeal. This appeal accompanied with the narration of linked non-linked events in various places and non-places gives the novel a paradigm shift to a point, where various so-called "postmodern" and "post-structural" elements can be argued. Also, leaving the plot and the setting of the novel aside, it is the narrative, by its intricate, constantly crisscrossing web of memories, which presents the novel with innate cultural and sub-cultural elements that in turn provides the novel with a latent "non-absolute" space. And it is this "non-absolute" space that needs to be cultivated in order to understand the aspect of "postmodernism" in the novel.

Postmodernism is a style and concept in the arts characterized by distrust of theories and ideologies and by the drawing of attention to convention. It was developed by academics in the 1950s-1960s in a reaction against scientific efforts to explain reality objectively. It was fashionable and dominant mode of analysis in many academic circles in last decades of the 20th century. Postmodernist thought influenced many disciplines, including religion, literary criticism, sociology, ethics and morality, linguistics, architecture, history, politics, international relations, anthropology, visual arts and music.

Fredric Jameson described postmodernism as "the specialization of culture under the pressure of organised capitalism." Space, definitely plays a fundamental role in the novel. At the very outset, the setting of the novel in different physical spaces attributes to the conditions of constructs and these constructs thereby gives the novel a "postmodern" dimension. This postmodern dimension is further extended, when placing the novel in a globalised cultural space of the present day. However, the validity of this argument is sustained only when postmodernism is viewed as a manufactured product of globalization and the construct as nothing more than imaginary cultural sub-space which dominates the narrative of the novel. These constructs, however, presented the novel a certain aesthetic dimension, as Foucault expounded ecstatically on what he called the "Aesthetics of Existence" and it is these aesthetics of the novel which shift the emphasis of such construct from "collective political action" to self-gratification it is the self-gratification of such space and sub-space, which cluster and form links with each other never shows signs of collective unity or political unison that provides the novel its postmodern image.

Coming to Frederic Jameson's remark of postmodernism being "the specialization of culture under the pressure of organised capitalism" if we view The Shadow Lines as a postmodern text, we do find this specialization in both the plot and narrative. Analysing the main character-the narrator, his uncle Tridib, his cousin Ila and also, May-all fall into different spatial contracts. Not only the main characters, even the narrator's grandmother and all the other characters comply with the requirements of the construct and fit in them. Therefore propounding on the nature of these constructs, as historically all the constructs in the novel are a result of either British Colonialism or globalization and both are nothing but various mechanisms of global capitalism, the very basic postmodern characteristic of the novel is just spaces in between space. There can be no voice of unified reasoning found anywhere in the novel. And this of course is a very much post-modern phenomenon as one of the fundamentals of postmodernism, according to French post-modernist, Lyotard, i.e. - the propounding of facts based on reason with historical significance. Thus these constructs essentially self-gratify themselves.

The postmodern analysis of Shadow Lines, however, remains incomplete without looking at the class-politics of the novel. A very distinct class-line can be found in the novel is the characterization of its characters and in the events and non-events and in the narrative coming to the character first, most of the characterization that takes place all bear the same class hologram- either bureaucracy or socially upwardly mobile. The however has the exception of the narrator's childhood narrative, in the character of his grandmother still, a certain class phenomenon can be attributed to the grandmother too as the characterization makes her just a product of and onlooker to class politics.

Characterization of Tridib too has its own class-politics. Tridib from the very beginning has been portrayed as an image of longing for the narrator, someone that he always wants to be but can't as he lacks in faculty. This image has vivid class-politics. Tridib's whole character is based on the simple aim of alienating him and making a "magic image" out of the image. Such alienation which has been tried hard to be portrayed as intellectual alienation but which actually altogether attributed a class-alienation to the image. Also when the narrative steps into the realms of multiculturalism, through Ila first and then later through May and the Prices the class-political reserve a concrete foothold in the novel.

The non-absolute space that has been developed in The Shadow Lines is constituted of various spaces and sub-spaces, events and non-events. One of the main significance of these spaces, sub-spaces events and non-events is that they are localization, time bound and issue based for example, the relationship of the narrator with Ila is at its very heart, developed on a cultural and social construct and that construct is very much localized and time bound, not merely physically but also in the spaces and sub-spaces of the novel. And this phenomenon agrees fully with Foucault's idea of "micro-politics" which concerns itself with localized time bound and issue-bound space and atomized politics. Also the rhetoric of empowering without organizing politically which dominates the whole narrative of the novel adds up to the structural space of The Shadow Lines there by giving it a post structural dimension.

Conclusion

The Shadow Lines makes impossible coexistence and disrupted metaphysical boundaries into real struggles both for its narrator and its readers. In first section of the novel, Ghosh examined the process of 'going away' of the dispersal of his characters across continents and how inter personal bonds across cultural boundaries, cannot be sustained. In the section 'Coming Home' he examined against the backdrop of political events spanning about two decades, the post-colonial cultural displacement and the loss of the cultural commonality of the subcontinent points of fixity which were earlier determined by one's birth or one's home or even one's country have now become The Shadow Lines. The novel is full of symbolic references of houses old and new maps and mirrors, borders and boundaries, all these symbols in one way or the other deal with the theme of man's search for identity, his search for roots. This is not a story of the grandmother or Jethmoshai, but it is a story of every man torn between the past and the present.

References

1. Ghosh, Amitav. The Shadow Lines New Delhi: Penguin publisher 2009.
2. Hawley, John CAG. An Introduction, New Delhi: Foundation Books 2005.
3. <http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/postmodernism>.